A NEW LOOK IN RACING

EVEN since the advent of the automobile, certain individuals, particularly in Europe, have been attempting to build automobiles that are at once fast, safe and attractive. These are called sports cars. They are not built to hold many people, or for considerable riding, or do they have radios and heaters.

Usually, sports cars hold no more than two persons. They have no gear, are specifically for comfort. They are merely machines designed and constructed to give a perfect mechanical performance. They travel at a high speed, and all of the various parts—gears, steering apparatus and wheels—are precision built.

To test their capabilities, there have been road races throughout Europe for many years, and recently in America at such places as Bridgehampton, Long Island, and Watkins Glen, New York. This should not be confused with stock car or hot rod racing. These cars are built for road racing, an ordinary street. Police restrict all certain portions of public roads, which are used as the racing course. The course can run from 4 miles, as at Bridgehampton, Long Island, to 1000 miles for the famous malle miglia run in Italy. The drivers must negotiate corners, bridges, hills, etc., at high speed.

Since this sport is coming into vogue again in our country, Americans are also attempting to build automobiles for road racing. The comparison between a handmade Swiss watch and a factory-made watch can be drawn between an ordinary factory-produced automobile, and the knowledge and experimentation that go into the making of cars like the British Jaguar and the Italian Alfa-Romeo.

Races in Europe, at Le Mans and Monza, all have brought into focus the most drivers like Berndt Rosemeyer and Rudolf Caracciolo of Germany, Dick Seaman the Englishman, and Walter Collier and Briggs Cunningham of this country.

Motorcycles, mopeds and car owners have also attracted fans. The German Mercedes-Benz, for example, was designed by Gottlieb Daimler in 1885. This car proved so satisfactory in performance, durability and power that a factory was established to produce the car for popular sale.

Others who designed and built cars are Dr. Porsche from Austria, who created the Auto-Union car, the Italian Cisitalia, and the popular German Volkswagen. An enthusiastic genius, Enrico Bugatti, conceived, designed and built a car which everyone said wouldn't work. The car was called the Royale, and it not only worked, but usually won most of the races. Bugatti established a factory and built many cars. Although there are no longer made, the old ones can still beat most cars of a road race.

Because these cars are raced at high speed, under any weather conditions, they must be mechanically perfect, carrying a minimum of equipment. The braking system is so effective that even at a high rate of speed, the car can be brought to a halt much quicker than an ordinary car. Its wheels are placed in such a way that the car can negotiate a corner with facility and safety. Gages and dials on the dashboard are located so as to be readily legible, and avoid any distractions which might cause an accident.

There are also rules which must be followed by the participant and the spectator. For example, there are only certain areas on the course where cars may pass each other. If the officials determine that a certain part of the road is too dangerous, then passing is prohibited. If any driver breaks these rules he is disqualified.

Also, it is against the rules to try to prevent another car from passing by going from one side of the road to another. If a car is capable of overtaking another, it has the legal right to do so.

Spectators have a great responsibility at a road race. Since it is a dangerous sport, lack of consideration on the part of a spectator, who might casually stroll onto the road, may cause an accident.

If you ever attend a race, remember: Stand only in the areas designated by the officials. Stand back from the road edge. Never, under any circumstances, cross or walk on the road, and never congregate around a car which has had an accident. Remember, a driver's life as well as your own may depend on you!

Sports car racing is exciting, because it is a challenge, not only to man's ability to build perfect machinery, but to his sense of adventure and competition. However, owners, designers and mechanics have done much to promote the development of better and safer automobiles, as well as inspiring for themselves fame, fortune and fun!
